

THE POCAHONTAS TIMES

Entered at the Postoffice at Marlinton, W. Va., as second class matter.

Calvin W. Price, Editor.

THURSDAY, APRIL 27, 1922

Sunday before last being an adept in the art of walking, we laid off a round and went up the Price Run to the headwaters and crossed over the dividing ridge to the Sharp Run, and followed it down to its mouth at Stony Creek, and down that stream to the pike, and with the pike home, about four miles in all, being a Sabbath stroll but about four times as long as the Sabbath day's journey of the holy writ.

Then the next week we took a longer circle, too long to walk. We went down the Greenbrier River to where it enters into the New, and followed down the bank of that stream to where it changes its name to the Kanawha, thence down that stream to the mouth of Elk, thence up Elk River to a bend in the stream, thence across the divide to the waters of the Little Kanawha, and up that stream and across the divide to the waters of the West Fork, thence down to the forks of the Monongahela, thence up the east fork, Tygart's Valley River to the point where the moonshiner enters an enclosure, thence across the divide to the waters of Cheat River, and up the same to the head of the Far Fork of Greenbrier, and down the same to the forks of the Greenbrier and continuing down said stream to the mouth of Knapps Creek, six hundred miles, more or less.

The way the challenge was: "Tickets please!" And the countersign, "Here it is," and the presentation of a pass that you had bought at a little window in a wall. The time occupied was one week to the minute, that is from 4:35 p. m. Saturday, the 15th, to 4:35 p. m. Saturday, the 22nd. The country traversed showed a great diversity of climate and seasonal changes ranging from the bleak, barren woods of our native land where the highest peaks glistened with frost in the sunlight, to the hills of the country around the mouth of Elk, which have put on their summer garments. And, almost the first half that we got when we landed on Main Street, was that he reckoned that there would be another edition in the Pocahontas Times. To which we replied that we had become the kind of the traveler that could make a clean breast of his experiences and tell the world about them. And that seemed to plunge him into a fit of introspection, and he troubled us no more. So hearken to the travail of the traveler, always remembering that there is nothing to prevent you throwing the paper across the room any time that you weary of the humdrum narrative of a tiresome and tedious journey. It has come to us after all these years, that the most unimportant fact is more welcome than the profoundest theory. But to get that thought to you, we had to propound a theory, but what can you expect of an inconsistent language, which spells phonetic without an 'f'.

We tarried at Lewisburg over Sunday. Tarry is a good word. We get it out of the Bible. And we arrived there after dark, and found that the Democrats had been showing signs of life. There had been a Democratic gathering there and there had been speaking. The Democratic candidates, they burgeon in the spring. And when the west wind melts the snow, when birds begin to sing. It is hard to understand how we Democrats show so much strength in caucus and so much weakness at the polls. And at Lewisburg, what continued to be the sole topic of conversation wherever any Democrats were congregated, and that was who was to be the head of the ticket this year, that is, the nominee of the party for the United States Senatorship. There are two well advertised possibilities, our old war governor, John J. Cornwell, and our brilliant and experienced statesman, W. E. Chil-ton. The entente cordiale heretofore existing between these distinguished gentlemen has become somewhat frayed and shows signs of being thrown into the discard. So alarmed have some patriotic partisans become over the condition of the fabric, that they are thinking of bringing out the Hon. Tertium Quid, who has been kept unspotted from the world in some sort of a cloister. With some such third party whose weaknesses have not been tested, it is thought that some incipient bitterness may be avoided. And we dabbled with the thought ourselves for a while, but it has come to us out of the air that the best thing to do with these friendly rivals, is to try the issue out and get it behind us. As long as the case is continued it will be an awkward thing to handle. Let the succession be determined. Contests are to be avoided in all but exceptional cases, but the time comes every now and then when you can show a man better than you can tell him, and this moment we are of the opinion that the proper course to pursue is to have a vote on the question of which one of these two men is to be chosen, and then get ready to support the winner enthusiastically, and hold the other gentleman in reserve for another election, for the time may soon come when we will need them both.

Then too the Republican party is so strong in this State, that it may hereafter appear that if we do not have a fight in the primary that we may not have the excitement of winning at all. Anyway it seems that we are apt to take the rivalry of politicians too seriously. Just as the surgeons realize that it is necessary at times to use the knife, it is fitting and essential for the voter to use a club, in getting rid of annoyances. Our friends, the Republicans, do not seem to be a bit more confident that do the Democrats, though the Democrats are notorious self-deceivers, for a democrat never knows when he is licked. Just now it is Sutherland against the field. There are a number of Republicans who would like to see Sutherland retired to private life, but they do not know exactly how to do it, for the great unwashed debauch from the mouth of the hollow, and vote him into office. Abe Lilly, the vote getter, is already out in the open, and he will get a lot of votes. He is so strong in the State, that his opponents think that the only thing that can beat him is the old cunning maxim, of divide and conquer.

And another observation before we leave the disagreeable subject of politics. There is a disposition to try to run the mill with the water that has passed; and to require all candidates to purge themselves of disloyalty to Wilson. It is like the old bugaboo that once dwelt in the party of whether so and so had been loyal to Bryan. To our way of thinking, this is a small matter. It is like rejecting a good man because he does not beat too much to say that charges like these are never made from good motives. No one reveres Wilson more than we do. But we have more friends who voted against Wilson than who voted for him, and we do not propose to wander forlorn and forsaken through the world because of a difference of opinion. We will never cease to think that those who assailed Wilson viciously in the last election, were even as the ass that kicked the sick lion. Let every tui stand upon its own bottom.

Let us pause to consider that no small part of the evil of politics is the endless and fruitless discussions that go on for months and months until the drift of public opinion settles it in one short day, and we did not mean to say anything about politics when we sat down to the typewriter. The common fate of good intentions.

We worshipped, as in duty bound at the Old Stone Church, and we verily believe that there is such a thing as sacred atmosphere in a church like that which brings peace and healing to the tortured soul. It is hard to express, but some churches do have a greater degree than others, and it may be caused by the spirits of innumerable dead made perfect, for that old Stone Church is one of the original fortresses of religion in the United States. We have been there often, and we have felt the influence of the surroundings, and it has always been the same, and it is nothing more than right to tell about it, for it is a blessed truth. These people of Lewisburg may stand nearer the unseen world than they have ever dreamed of.

But we did not mean to boast that we went to church on a Sunday. It was just to record the fact, to make way for a record of Sunday recreation, a question that every man figures out for himself. In shaping a scheme of life, one of the things that we permitted in the Sunday list was walking. Free and unlimited walking. Not the Sabbath day's journey of the Mosala law of less than one mile, nor yet the rule of the Scotch church, that made any walking in a field, or by a stream on Sunday a crime and misdemeanor. But a long walk that will drive the purifying blood to the finger tips and make an old man new again. "Walk and be healthy," said Mr. Dickens. "Walk steadily and with a purpose. The wandering man knows of certain ailments, far gone in years, who have staved off the infirmities and dissolution by earnest walking." He walks close upon eighty and ninety, but brisk as boys.

Lewisburg is like all other towns, addicted to automobiles, and they have driven the pedestrian off of the highways, for if the walker falls into a pleasant train of thought he is apt to fall under a Juggernaut, model of 1922. Jumping sideways is no fit employment for a dignified man any way. And we had had enough of roads around Lewisburg on former occasions, and putting two and two together we remembered that the editor of the Greenbrier Independent had the reputation of being an oddity in that he would walk when he could have ridden. So we hunted him up and mentioned the subject of automobile infested roads and whether farmers shot traps who tried to climb their wire fences, and soon got up a walking match, something that we had not bargained for. It soon became apparent that it was a contest as to which one could foot it farthest. From one o'clock to seven it was a steady walk and during that whole time the foot was hardly off of thick blue grass sod, as grateful to the tread as the thickest carpet ever woven.

We made a kind of a game of it, in that we kept to pasture lands and avoided fields that had known the plow. We took to a ridge and went north towards Maxwellton, and there swung around west and circled back to Lewisburg, and before we got back we were devoutly thankful that we had trained for such a contest. The editor of the ultra conservative paper estimated that we had strolled a matter of twelve miles, but we hold to fifteen, based on the time that we took. The sun was shining. The grass was green. The blue dome was cloudless. Rabbits got under our feet. And once a fox squirrel ambled ahead of us along a rail fence. We had not seen one of these big brown squirrels since Hector was a pup.

We knew that there were great areas of blue grass land in the Big Levels, but we never before realized the immensity of their bounds. For our fifteen mile walk over such grass as a golf professional would hazard his immortal soul to possess, was but a small part of the pastures that stretched for mile after mile in every direction. It seems to us that a man could walk himself to death in the Big Levels and never have to use the same ground but once. And we have reason to believe that few citizens of that town know or appreciate the possibilities of the grass that grows to their very door steps, as a playground. They do not need to worry about a golf course. Their horizon is covered with a natural one.

In prehistoric days the wilderness wanderer topped the mountain and looked down on the great treeless plain, covered then as now with grass and reported it as the great savannah in 1774 an army rendezvous was ordered at the great savannah, at the big spring, where the town of Lewisburg now is. They have left the word savannah languish of late years, but the savannah itself is there.

Monday morning we decided to ride on the train to Charleston, not having time to foot it, and we passed through the coal field and saw the mines were nearly all idle, owing to the state of the market and the labor disputes. Coal is a great source of wealth but there is so much of it, and if every wheel was turning there are so many mines, and so many laborers, and so much time saving machinery, that there could be employment for but a part of those who are willing to work in hazards of a mine far underneath the ground.

There is a fuss on now about the wages, and it is anything but pleasant to be there now, and you can jolly well believe that we did not inquire into the merits of the case. Oh no, we never mentioned her. The federal term of the court was on, and Judge McClintic was engaged in following the path of justice that leads through the greatest judicial maze on earth, to-wit, the respective rights of the persons directly interested in the law appertaining to injunctions in disputes between the employer and the employee. The learned clerks that run the daily newspapers added to the bewilderment by announcing that Judge McClintic had been reversed when an appellate court, as if there was anything unusual for a dissatisfied litigant taking an appeal in a pending cause.

And on Tuesday, a multitude came to the Federal Court building and it was a great aggregation. Lawyers, jurors, witnesses, special agents, inspectors, defendants, bondsmen, prisoners, and all classes and conditions of mankind. We had heard a good deal about the charge that Judge McClintic makes to a grand jury in this period of unrest when the people are inclined to kick against the pricks, but we had not realized how impressive it could be. The great courtroom was packed and jammed, and they were silent that they might hear. The Judge's style of delivery is after the school of the late Senator Vest—every word carefully chosen, deftly launched, and of full weight and fitness. He told the grand jury that they represented one of the oldest institutions known to the law, which for a thousand years had stood between the tyranny of the governing officials on one side and the outlaws on the other. And we were particularly struck with his interpretation of the prohibition law, and he made it plain that it was not only no joke, but that it was very bad taste to make a joking matter of it. That a man might become a criminal and conspirator against the law by aiding in a sale of liquor, by telling a thirly man where he could find a bootlegger. Thus a conspiracy to violate a law would have been formed by the buyer, and the seller, and the witness gobetween, who did not have presence of mind enough to see what his acquiescence and godnature was leading him into. We cannot quote the Judge's words but can tell the impression that was made by them. Another thing that we had not thought about was mentioned, and that is that a man might lose his farm by allowing it to become a place for the violation of the prohibition law.

This court is what a court is supposed to be, that is open to the high and the low alike. Here the very drags of humanity face the Judge, and here the highest type of man tells his troubles. But the first days of a regular term are crowded with suffering humanity, and it is a very depressing spectacle. The defendants for most part pleaded guilty, and the court gave them their respective portions. Most of the cases were for violation of the prohibition law. A few minutes to a case. One case the defendant asked for a jury, and in a short time the jury looked upon the prisoner, and the prisoner looked upon the jury, and without a witness being heard, the defendant withdrew his plea of not guilty, entered a plea of guilty, and was sentenced.

We heard of a case that would have interested us, but we did not see it tried. The way it was related to us was that the defendants in a liquor case were surprised at night and were seen to throw something from buckets in a running stream. The defendants said that they had been singing and that they had thrown the sang in the water. It is said that they claimed that they sang at night and carried their findings in buckets. They were weak on botany and the jury so found. They must of been thinking of the statement that the morning stars sang together.

While in Charleston, we saw the Governor. He is the same strong, rugged man that he always was, of first ability and courage. It was the first time that we had seen him since he took charge of the ship of state. He sits in a shack bossing a million men. We called to submit a matter of political economy, to the effect of changing the law so that there would be four Sundays in every week, in order that there might be work enough to keep every laboring man busy every week day. He said he would consider the proposition. Maybe next week we will get all the way round the circle described above, but no more at present.
